Before we left Camp Dennison we had everal cases of messles, most of which were of a mild course and terminated farably, and we hoped that we were through with that scourge of military amps, but with our removal from Camp Dennison our troubles began. We reached Platte City, our temporary post during most of the month of February, on the 80th of January, having left more than fifty sick and disabled soldiers in the hospitals at St. Louis. Very soon after our arrival in Platte City we had two large rooms filled with our sick, besides many in company barracks, for whom we could find no better place. Most of the cases were measles with subsequent pulmonary inflammation. We had an abudant supply of medicine, but we suffered greatly from want of hospital stores, such as bed macks, hedding, necessary hospital furni-

June and July. The weather was intensely hot and dry, water was scarce, and the unwholesome food, in addition to the forced marches and the depression ever attending an unsuccessful expedition, caused a great amount of severe sickness, mostly typhoid fever. The sick suffered greatly on the return. Several died on the way, and more after we reached Fort Scott. But on our arrival there we found Mr. J. R. Brown of the United States Sanitary Commission ready to furnish us, without cost, with whatever delicacies or necessities our sick required. Mr. Brown has been unwearied in his efforts to ascertain and supply the wants of the United States troops in his department, making tedious journeys for no other purpose, and using all speed to learn the true condition of the sick, and what kind of care they received. The complete organization of the work of re-lieving the wants of sick soldiers thus birving the wants of sick soldiers thus provides a channel by which the benefactions of their friends may reach them with far more certainty than in any other way. And I am fully persuaded that no existing organization relieves and prevents so much iffering as the United States Sanitary Commission and the Soldiers' Aid Socie-
